

Abstract

The subject of the present invention is an electrolytic polishing process for dental instruments of nickel-titanium alloy using an electrolyte comprising sulfuric acid and methanol. The electricity is supplied by applying a current, the current density being regulated so that it remains constant.